Here are the 5 skillsets a company looks for-

1. Leadership:

Leadership abilities can be an important advantage in your job, regardless of whether you hold a supervisory position. If you have leadership qualities, you may inspire, educate, and advise others. People with leadership talents have faith in their capacity to facilitate work, collaboration, problem-solving, or success in one's duties.

2. Teamwork:

Effective teamwork is facilitated by the interpersonal skills of those who work well in groups. To carry out at least a portion of their job duties, many employees collaborate with their coworkers or superiors. Professionals that are adept at working in a team know how to do their tasks while keeping mindful of the tasks and requirements of others.

3. Emotional intelligence:

The term "emotional intelligence" refers to how we communicate our emotions, interact with others, and analyse other people's actions. Professionals with high emotional intelligence can discern others' emotions through their acts, words, and behaviours. You are also able to recognise, analyse, and appraise your emotions if you have emotional intelligence. Professionals benefit from emotional intelligence in a variety of social contexts, whether they are interacting with clients, coworkers, or managers.

4. Organization:

You can complete tasks and projects with the aid of your organisational skills. Professionals that are organised know how to set priorities, make plans, and carry them through. Since many organisations require projects to be finished quickly and according to deadlines, a person's time management skills are frequently strongly related to their organising skills.

5. Communication:

The majority of professionals engage in several forms of communication, including telephone calls, meetings, in-person conversations, emails, and instant messaging platforms. Communication experts know how to convey information effectively, communicate ideas, and pay attention to what the other person is saying. The most common forms of communication are written or verbal, but they can also include reading body language.

Professionals that are good at communicating may also handle difficult social circumstances with ease, such as bargaining or coming to concessions.

1. Commitment:

Respect and trust are brought about by commitment. Any task, no matter how small, looks worthless without it. Any task completed without dedication is regarded as fragile and inadequate.

2. Honesty:

Trust is the most important thing you must get at work. Honest workers are up-forward and honest with their employer and coworkers about their work, accept their errors, and present only the facts. You can pretend to be a professional while working and picking up skills. But it's impossible to pass for honesty.

3. Flexibility:

You must immediately adjust to the existing circumstance as well as any future changes if you wish to survive in any working setting. You must embrace change and take appropriate action. Once they learn that you are not frightened of difficult situations and that you handle them as effectively as possible, your potential employers will undoubtedly have a favourable opinion of you.

4. Reliability:

You must establish a foundation of trust with your employers and coworkers right away. If you demonstrate to everyone that you are moral and trustworthy, the tide will soon turn in your favour.

5. Determination:

Resilience and determination go hand in hand. Nothing should be so bad that it causes you to lose interest in your passion. You will be grateful that you were tenacious and persistent since it helped you land a job and secure your future.
